

When you go to buy your first used car, will you know what to look for? This list is a pretty good one to follow.

1. Look for a car you can afford to own.

Don't forget that any car costs more than just its initial price. In addition, you'll need money for gas, oil, routine upkeep and insurance. So before you shop, figure out a budget that takes these things into account, and then choose a car that you can comfortably afford to keep.

2. Check for signs of careful use.

Of course, a clean, fresh interior indicates that the car was well cared for. And good rubber suggests that the car was driven carefully. But the way the car runs means a lot to you, too. So be sure to test its performance by taking it out for a drive. And pay particular attention to the brakes and the way it corners. It may even pay to have your dad or a friend who also knows something about cars along with you.

3. Go to a steady, responsible dealer.

Like your Chevy dealer. Chances are, the one in your neighborhood has been in the business a long time. He knows cars. New and used. He also knows this isn't the only car you'll buy in your lifetime. And he wants you to be a happy enough customer to come back again. That's why he'll encourage your questions, let you take your time, and let you test drive the cars that interest you most. So go on in where you see the big OK sign—at your Chevrolet dealer's—and introduce yourself. . . . Chevrolet Division of General Motors, Detroit, Michigan.
